

Employee Benefit Statements

Is Your Company Getting All The Bang It Deserves From Your Benefit Bucks?

According to a recent study, the average employer in the U.S. spends 42 percent of payroll for fringe benefits. Thus, an employee earning $30,000 a year is receiving fringe benefits worth $12,600. Industry surveys show that while employees receive thousands of dollars in statutory and fringe benefits annually, many have no idea what their benefits are or how much the employer is paying for those benefits.

Since most employees do not understand what their benefits are or how much they cost, they usually have little appreciation for them. And when employees don't appreciate what their employer is doing for them in the way of fringe benefits, they often become unhappy with their benefits program, and that leads to poor morale, higher turnover and reduced productivity.

On the other hand, when employees understand and appreciate their benefits, morale improves which leads to reduced turnover, higher productivity and greater profits.

Communication Is The Key

Most employers have found that the best way to help their employees understand and appreciate the value of their employer provided fringe benefits is to give each employee a personalized benefit statement report at least once every year.
